LEARNING, TEACHING AND ASSESSMENT INFORMATION

6a. Module Description

In this module you will consider how spirituality and religion have diversified and changed in a globalised society, and explore changing patterns of belief, practice and association. You will have the opportunity to investigate aspects of spirituality, such as mindfulness and meditation, and new personal rituals, such as fixing 'love locks' on Paris bridges, or setting up roadside memorials. You will explore how traditional religions have adapted and changed in a more 'liquid' society, for example, by going online; but also how some religious groups have reacted against globalisation. And you will discover new secular forms of belief and practice and learn about the rise of people identifying as of 'no religion'.

You will look at how sociologists have historically examined religious beliefs, practices, movements and institutions in order to understand more about the implications of these for individuals, societies and communities. But you will also learn how as contemporary sociologists we can continue to explore and understand the cultural and political significance of religion and spirituality and their interaction with secular world-views within the context of globalisation.

You will have the opportunity to undertake structured skill development in presentation and debate, and in written analysis. These skills contribute to future employability skills and relate to other outcomes on your degree. This module is taught by interactive sessions and may include visits to places of spirituality and/or religion, such as mosques, churches and meditation centres.
