LEARNING, TEACHING AND ASSESSMENT INFORMATION

6a. Module Description

Communication is a fundamental aspect of being human, and most people tend to take it for granted – at least in terms of the physical possibility of communicating. However, for a significant number of children and adults, this is not the case. The Royal College of Speech and Language Therapists estimates that 20% of the UK population will experience communication difficulty at some point in their lives, with more than 10% of children having a long-term communication need. Communication disorders can have a profound effect both on the individuals who have them and on their families. They can lead to a reduction in quality of life and significant limitations in educational and occupational opportunity. In this module you will learn about the range of communication disorders, the research that has been done to understand them, the social and personal effects they can have, and the possible treatments. There is an emphasis on analysing data which may be in the form of phonetic or textual transcriptions of disordered speech and other communication.
